To understand the significance of the latest political developments in Germany two things are necessary-first cuadour and next coolness. It Word same direct from the Chinese Liegation is as easy to exaggerate as to underestimate the to-night that if the bill became a law it would importance of the recent riots and the reverse of hat revolution Blood and waited at the gates of the Rejoustag. If we should listen to the optimistic talk of the ministerialists we might fancy that all was well in the Fatherland. Both conclusions would be foolish, for the truth lies somewhere between optimism and possimism. The situation is disquieting, but it has not yet become dangerous. That the prestige and potency of the existing system in Prussia have son affected by the events of the last few weeks s unquestionable, but we are not on the brink of a political catastrophs. Socialism may have to wait some time yet before it will be able to unsettle the foundation of the empire. On the sarface all is peaceful. The Kaiser rides and drives about as usual. The politicians are still alking and the streets are filled with life and bustle; but if we look below the surface we find more than one cause for uneasiness. The growth and strength of the Social Democrats, the uncertainty resulting from the papuliarities of the young Kaiser, the increasing cost of food, high rents in Berlin, the prevailing distress among the working classes, the ominous revival of the Jawish question—all these are facts which might tax the resources of even stronger statesmen than Count Caprivi and the new Prussian Premier, Eulemberg.

Lastly and perhaps chiefly, it is impossible not to be struck by the amazing change which has come over Berliners of all classes. I refer to the irreverence with which they treat their rulers, the lightness with which that discuss the public speeches of their sovereign and the boldness with which, even in the Reichstag, men like Liebknecht and Behl express their views and aspirations.
